1821  El Salvador gained independence from Spain.

1880–1890  The government of El Salvador took communal land from peasants and gave it to wealthy elites. Many Salvadorans were forced to leave their land and become laborers in the coffee industry.

1930s  The Great Depression struck El Salvador. Many Salvadorans (who already lost their land) now lost their jobs.

1932  Salvadorans organized to demand their rights. In response, the Salvadoran government killed thousands of its citizens. Power became even more concentrated in the hands of wealthy elites and the military.

Over the following decades, thousands of Salvadorans fled the country in search of work and better conditions.

1969  El Salvador and Honduras fought a war, and Honduras expelled 300,000 Salvadorans who had been living there. This increased economic and social pressure in El Salvador, and many people were unable to find work.

1979–1992  El Salvador fought a bloody civil war. The United States provided aid to the government during the war.

1 million people (about one-fifth of the population) were displaced. Approximately 750,000 Salvadorans were killed and thousands more were tortured or disappeared. The government committed more than 85% of these atrocities.

At the end of the war, people in the country were militarized and traumatized by the violence.

1990  During the war, the United States denied 98% of asylum applications from Salvadorans, since it was aiding the Salvadoran government.

In 1990, the United States government agreed, under pressure, to grant Salvadorans fleeing violence Temporary Protected Status (TPS) in the United States. People who have TPS may not apply for permanent residence or citizenship in the United States, unlike those who are granted asylum. TPS may also be revoked at any time.

By 1992, approximately 187,000 Salvadorans with TPS lived in the United States.
| 1990s | The United States government and international organizations pressured developing countries around the world, including El Salvador, to cut spending on social programs, especially education. Some Salvadorans in the United States joined gangs and then were later deported back to El Salvador, bringing their gang organizing with them. Gang violence grew to much more extreme levels in El Salvador due to the pervasive inequality, violence, and corruption. |
| 2000s | The economy of El Salvador continued to decline. Many young Salvadorans joined gangs in search of economic and social opportunities, which were difficult to find otherwise. |
| 2001 | Two deadly earthquakes struck El Salvador. As a result, more Salvadoran migrants were granted TPS in the United States. In 2016, there were approximately 195,000 Salvadorans in the United States who held TPS. |
